

sheep, and to get prepared with their lessons against their friend the parson came. It was pleasing to see this sweet little shepherd and shepherdess trudging along together, arm in arm, in the most loving and affectionate manner. It is much to be wished, that all brothers and sisters would imitate these sweet children, and, instead of wrangling and quarrelling among themselves, would like them live in the same harmony.

As soon as Amintor and his sister saw Mr. Stubbs coming, they went to meet him, and wish him a good morning. "Good morning to you, my pretty children, (said Mr. Stubbs) I can see by your looks that you have got your lesson." "Yes, Sir, (said Florella) I hope we have; and it was with great pleasure that we read your history of a good boy, as it certainly is more agreeable to hear of good children than naughty ones." They then walked on to the shady tree they usually sat under, and there themselves, the pretty little sheep read as follows.

"A pretty little boy having to go to a village, which was a few miles from his own home, set out in the morning, and carried provisions with him, not choosing to stop any in his little journey for refreshment. The first thing he met with was a spaniel, that seemed half famished, poor creature, feeble as he was, at him very earnestly, and wagging his tail. Our little traveller concluded he was hungry, and though he knew he brought out with him but a few shillings' worth of money, yet he determined to give him a small allowance, yet he determined to give him a poor creature part of it, which he accordingly did, and the little animal being devoured it greedily, in return he kept him company all the way.

"Our little traveller had not gone much further, when he came upon
